COURSE OVERVIEW: A Must-Know for police executives, training officers, investigators and patrol officers.

- When may you ask questions unrelated to the original purpose of a traffic stop?
- What questions may be asked during a traffic stop?
- What questions may be asked of passengers during a traffic stop?
- When may you summon a drug sniffing canine during a stop?
- May officers once again routinely conduct warrant checks on passengers during vehicle stops?
- What authority does an officers have to control vehicle occupants?
- What factors now determine the scope of a consent search of intimate areas of a person's body?
- May the property of a non-arrestee located in a vehicle be searched "incident to arrest"?
- How long must officers wait before forcing entry after knocking and announcing?
- Does violating knock and announce requirements mandate exclusion of evidence?
- And much, much more.

In light of recent cases, new answers must be supplied to these questions and others which profoundly affect the way officers may perform during a vehicle stop or other encounter with a citizen.

Recent significant case decisions are forcing departments to reexamine their practices in order to remain proactive, particularly during vehicle stops.

Troubleshooting examines how police may adapt their practices to meet the new requirements and limitations placed upon them.
